"RAMONA" NOVEL OFFERING.

Will Be Shown at Colonial September 28 and 29.

With the promise that on this occasion local theater-goers will see a genuine novelty in offerings of the American stage, announcement is made that the cinema operatic spectacle, "Ramona," will open its first engagement here at the Colonial Wednesday, Thursday, Sept. 27 and 28. This is the cinematic and musical production adapted from Helen Hunt Jackson's famous romance of California and the Mission Indians produced by W. H. Clune, who was one of the makers of that other mighty spectacle, "The Birth of a Nation."

Local interest in this unique production has been whetted by newspaper comment and magazine articles of the past several months, which attribute to it many unusual features. Described as the very biggest film made in the world, it is the point that the production as a photodrama is no greater than it is a musically-accompanied spectacle. This claim is based on the fact that a score requiring nearly three hours for a special orchestra to play is a part of the performance. But the greatest praise that has been accorded is on the premise that the photodrama is a faithful picturing of the amazingly popular novel, bringing to the theater without loss at any point the imperishable charm and appeal of the original work, which has come to be called "the love story of the ages."

As all "Ramona" readers know the locale of the story is southern California, unquestionably one of the most beautiful bits of country in the world. This gave wide opportunity for the photography of superb natural settings and that this chance was exploited to the limit of its possibilities is shown by frequent reference to the natural settings of "Ramona" as the most superb piece of landscape photography every achieved.
